Aground at Midnight by Peter Macdonald Blachly

On December 26, 1912, the 2,296-ton Italian steamer Tripolitania was driven ashore onto Loe Bar beach, near Porthleven, Cornwall, in a south-westerly gale. She became firmly embedded in the beach, with the waves driving her about 20' above the high tide mark. Despite strenuous efforts over the next few weeks, including removing much of the sand on the seaward side in an unsuccessful attempt to refloat her on a spring tide, she eventually had to be broken up where she lay, and shipped as scrap. One man was drowned, and his body never recovered, while two members of the Penlee lifeboat crew died shortly afterwards of pneumonia from the extreme exposure they endured while trying to make their way to and from the site of the wreck in the midst of the winter gale. Professionally framed, 16.5" wide x 14" high. Image size: 8" wide x 5-1/2" high.

Replica 1794 Truxtun Bowl

This Truxtun Bowl is a replica of the original 1794 punch bowl on display in the US Navy Museum. The original was made for Captain Thomas Truxtun, noted for his command of the frigate USS Constellation during the Quasi-War with France in 1798 to 1800. Truxtun had served on privateers during the American Revolutionary War. In 1794, Truxtun was appointed one of six captains to oversee the building of the United States Navy's first frigates. That year, to illustrate a book he was publishing on navigation, he asked naval constructor Josiah Fox, who would play a part in designing these ships, for a drawing of a 44-gun frigate. Truxtun commissioned two punch bowls featuring Fox's drawing. One of these is at the US Navy Museum located in Washington, DC. The other bowl, presented to President George Washington, is in Washington's home in Mount Vernon.
